This extra data will only be displayed if a specific operation (e.g. a command) is performed on the file, at the application's startup. The idea is that it will be included in a proprietary product, which I could only provide to certain users (customers). Any idea of how to do so? This is how I imagine it should work. (*) If the file is a text file, then I could use a checksum (e.g. md5, sha, or any other tool available on Linux). But I would like to be able to save it in another way (some extended header for example). A: This is used very often in processing checksums. See MD5Sum, SHA1Sum, and SHA2Sum The "basic" uses for this are to store the checksum, in a format that is easy to display, and to store information about how to compute the checksum in a particular file, so that an invalid checksum can be generated easily. In the case of an invalid checksum in an MD5SUM, or in a SHA1SUM or a SHA256SUM, you want the checksum to be discarded, and there should be no recoverable information. You could throw the checksum out if it is invalid, and then you could process the file with a different checksum function. You could then display the result of the test with the new checksum, and you could state edd6d56e20
